[Simple construction of a new type of resistive circuit based on software algorithm]. A new type of a resistive circuit simulating different resistance values has been developed. It differs from the ordinary resistive circuit with a programmable analog resistive element (PAR) by making more constant the variation of the resistance values under the change of the measuring parameters such as the voltage level and the temperature. The circuit uses a S-R (Sigma-R) circuit including a resistive element to convert the input into a frequency signal. As the input signal is manipulated by a software algorithm, the resistance values of the resistive element are changed automatically in accordance with the actual situation, for example, in the presence of abnormal noise. The new circuit is characterized by its simple construction. It has been effectively applied in practical frequency experiments.

Cisco Systems Inc. is planning to close the Valleycrest plant in Mesa Verde by the end of the year, cutting 720 jobs in the process, the company announced Thursday. The company said it plans to move its 350 workers at Valleycrest to a factory in Hillsboro. No Valleycrest jobs will be relocated, Cisco said. The Mesa Verde plant, built to produce networking equipment, makes network switches and routers, similar to the equipment being made at Hillsboro. The closings represent roughly 6% of the Valleycrest workforce — or 1,180 of its current 16,600 employees. Cisco, the networking company, has about 7,000 employees in Arizona, including 2,600 at Phoenix-based Avenue Solutions, the company's managed services company. About 300 of the Mesa Verde workers will transfer to facilities in Santa Barbara, Calif., where they will make networking equipment at Cisco's Network Systems and Services unit. The company also has facilities in Taipei, Taiwan, and Suzhou, China, where it makes networking equipment. Cisco said it expects the Valleycrest job cuts to save the company between $90 million and $130 million a year. In a statement, Cisco's CEO Chuck Robbins said the Valleycrest closure "is a difficult decision for our employees and families in Arizona, and I understand the impact it will have on our communities." "However, we believe it is the right decision for Cisco given our long-term plan for our Valleycrest campus. We have a positive vision for the campus, and we will continue to invest

The typical Iron Man costume that Tony Stark donned during the climax of The Avengers (Photo by Alexander Utan/Lionsgate) Take a deep breath. It's time to brace yourself. May the force be with you, because it's about to get hot under the collar. Today's trailers for the highly anticipated summer blockbuster, The Avengers: Age of Ultron, have got fans all worked up, and not just because of the Avengers' muscular physiques, witless banter and painfully awkward death scenes. The latest trailers, released by Disney/Marvel Studios, contain a lengthy scene that is reportedly being cut from the final film, in which Tony Stark (Robert Downey Jr.) is made to wear an all-in-one workout suit, complete with his trademark Iron Man logo on his chest. Do you think the suit looks cool? Cooler than the current Iron Man armor, you mean? I do. But we're talking about comics here, so we know that this new suit has got some serious power. "I have been waiting my whole life to do this!" Stark bellows during the trailer, before launching into the most brutal workout you've ever seen, during which he proves that the suit is hard to beat, even for Iron Man. It features a combination of targeting and targeting-plus-precision programs, along with an upgraded flight mode, a "Variable Grip" that increases resistance in your biceps and thighs, and "Combat Capabilities" that allow for strength training in a pseudo-gym setting. Some fans have been complaining about the amount of time that's spent on the suit. It's undoubtedly an integral part of the film, and Marvel's hype machine is obviously more interested in promoting this than the film itself, but the repetitive nature of the workout sequence has got some people concerned. But there's a simple fix for that, too. Another scene could be added. The face of the Iron Man helmet. (Photo by Kevin Winter/Getty Images) Within the comics, there's a long-standing tradition of having fans decide which suit of armor is the "best." In the first Iron Man, for example, people voted to have Stark get the Mark 1 "First" Iron Man suit, while in the follow-up, Iron Man 2, they voted to get the Mark 2 "Second." In the third film, Iron Man 3, fans were asked to choose between the Mark 16 "Minor" and Mark 32 "Major
