Photoshop is a powerful image editor (and digital image manipulation) tool. It's not only used by the professional designers and for full-time artists, but also by hobbyists and people who want to save, share and use images. Photoshop works with multiple layers. You can create multiple layers with different textures and effects and edit them separately. You can add transparent background and color to them. Other features include the ability to easily remove parts of images, make sure colors always match, and the ability to use a large number of different filters. You can also use the share button in Photoshop to quickly share images that you have edited or created in the app. Unlike most social media, you can share your creations directly to Photoshop, which means that you don't have to sign up for a separate account to share your pictures with your friends. Unfortunately, Photoshop is a complicated tool that requires a bit of work to learn. It's not especially easy to get started with, but once you feel comfortable using it, you'll be able to create images that are far superior to any that you have created using any other photo editing software. What's New In Adobe Photoshop 2022?

A slim majority of U.S. voters believe that Russia interfered in the 2016 presidential election, despite the official conclusion by the U.S. intelligence community that the Russian government was not responsible, a new poll shows. The Oct. 27-Nov. 1 survey found that 51 percent of people think Russian President Vladimir Putin interfered with the election, the largest portion of respondents since the questionnaire, conducted by the NBC News/Wall Street Journal, first began in late August. However, most voters also agree with the U.S. intelligence community and past reports from Obama administration officials who say the Russian government did not influence the American presidential election. Just over half, or 54 percent, of Americans believe the Kremlin wanted Trump to win, an opinion that also far outpaces the 10 to 14 percent who believe the Kremlin wanted Clinton to win. "Putin's intentions in 2016 have been a complete mystery for over two years," said GOP pollster Bill McInturff, who conducted the survey with Democratic pollster Fred Yang. "And despite all the good work the U.S. intelligence community has done, the American public is unable to get clarity on the question about Putin's intentions." The NBC/WSJ poll revealed that more than half of Republican and Democratic respondents alike think the American intelligence community either does not have enough information (73 percent of Republicans and 58 percent of Democrats) or that it is too politicized (57 percent of Republicans and 63 percent of Democrats) to know whether Putin was influencing the election. Despite the woeful gap on how Americans view Putin's motives, there is a confidence among most U.S. voters that the U.S. electoral system is robust enough to withstand further Russian tampering in future elections, according to the NBC/WSJ survey. When the NBC/WSJ poll first conducted, a total of 79 percent of Americans said they believe the security of future elections is a major national security threat. That number has since jumped to 85 percent, the survey showed. Despite that momentum, however, views on voter integrity have eroded among the American public since the NBC/WSJ poll first began, as 60 percent of people surveyed in the current poll agree with the statement that they "are not confident that every vote will be counted accurately." The NBC/WSJ poll found a notable gender gap on how voters view voter integrity in the U.S., as women are
