Q: Accessing attribute of field function in spec file I am having a field function in my model, called sellable. It has an attributes that is a boolean : class Product :model do # Error context 'when sellable is false' do before { FactoryGirl.create(:product, :sellable => false) } it { should have(1).errors_on(:sellable) } end end But it fails to compile with the error: NoMethodError: undefined method `invalidates_presence_of' for # I am not sure why this error is triggered. I am using Rails 4.2. A: You need to be more explicit about what you're trying to test by putting those tests into the context block: require 'rails_helper' RSpec.describe Product, type: :model do context 'when sellable is false' do before { FactoryGirl.create(:product, :sellable => false) } it { should have(1).errors_on(:sellable) } end end This is because the :sellable attribute is defined on the Product class, and the context blocks provide a scope for the tests to operate in. Q: Text editor framework for C++ I have recently discovered Qt creator. I am wondering how does it compare with vi/vim, esp. regarding development tools. Is there something similar out there for Windows? (I am not attached to one particular operating system) A: Well, let's start with the basics - are you a Windows user? Then you'll need to decide between vi and vim. vi is by far the most popular, and it's very difficult to beat the basic functionality that most Windows users are used to with it. Try VIm, it's free, and probably better than vim (but read the 'user feedback' link on its faq page). Then you've got the situation of the GTK text editing framework in Linux. There's emacs. There's also gedit, which is default. Finally, there's QT, but I haven't tried it, because I don't use Windows.

The clinical significance of trunk proprioception in patients with chronic stroke. To investigate the effects of trunk proprioception on trunk control and balance performance in chronic stroke patients by using the active trunk displacement response (ATDR) test. Thirty-seven patients with chronic stroke participated in the study. Trunk proprioception was measured by the ATDR test. The Trunk Impairment Scale and the Functional Ambulation Category were used to assess trunk impairment and functional ambulation. An inverse relationship was observed between the ATDR test and the Trunk Impairment Scale ( $r = -0.57$ ,  $P = 0.012$ ) and the Functional Ambulation Category ( $r = -0.73$ ,  $P$
