The interest in the communications market has increased greatly. Most businesses are aware of the benefits of maximizing the number of their customers by creating a web presence. However, once a website has been established, a customer must be added to the list of customers for the business to receive commission payments. Companies that have a large customer base often struggle to find other companies that they can reward for referring their customers. The present invention is a method of reselling calling card subscriptions that secures the a customer that orders a service from a communications service provider and a reseller. The present invention also allows the customer of the communications service provider and reseller to receive commission payments for referring the customer.

Q: Can I use Pi as a portable USB sound card? I have a Pi and would like to use it as a portable sound card. I know it will use the built-in DAC, but I want to be able to still use headphones without having to have a DAC connected. I want to be able to plug in my headphones directly, but still be able to use my Pi's built-in DAC. Is there a way to do this? A: This isn't exactly what you asked for, but it may be a better answer: As of the latest Raspbian release, there is a support for digital-out (jack) via hdmi and analogue (toslink) via composite audio. You can output stereo from the Pi (or at least stereo via jack) and those can be used with your headphones and/or portable speakers via their own mini
