To evaluate the effectiveness and reliability of prenatal diagnosis of neural tube defects by three-dimensional ultrasound (3D ultrasound) combined with real-time two-dimensional ultrasound. From January 1999 to December 2002, 95 cases of neural tube defects were diagnosed by 3D ultrasound and 2D ultrasound, and then the karyotypes were checked, and the outcome was followed up. 95 fetuses with neural tube defects were diagnosed by 3D ultrasound and 2D ultrasound. Most of the neural tube defects were detected by the cranial sonography. The other defects were detected by the whole abdomen sonography. 3D ultrasound could accurately show the defects in cranial and abdominal sides, such as lip, lip notch, and eye. The other defects could also be found in other part of the fetus. 3D ultrasound was more accurate than 2D ultrasound. All the cases with neural tube defects were followed up successfully. There were 22 cases with abnormal karyotypes, including 18 cases with trisomy 21 and 4 cases with other karyotypes, including trisomy 18. The pregnancies were terminated in 11 cases, including 9 cases of trisomy 21 and 2 cases of other karyotypes. There were 27 cases with normal karyotypes, and the outcome of these cases was further followed up. 3D ultrasound combined with real-time two-dimensional ultrasound is a sensitive, effective and reliable prenatal diagnostic method for neural tube defects, and it could be a new and effective diagnostic method for prenatal diagnosis of neural tube defects.
