Korean HakGyo Crack Free Download Description:Q: What's the difference between '%r' and '%(variable)r' in Python? What's the difference between %r and %(variable)r in Python? A: From the docs: % (prefix) Return a formatted version of the argument. prefix is a string to be displayed in the right-hand corner of the result. If the argument being formatted is a container type (list, tuple, dictionary or set), then the argument is converted to a string first. %r Return a formatted version of the argument. % (prefix)r Return a formatted version of the argument. The first argument, format, is a format string. If the argument being formatted is a container type (list, tuple, dictionary or set), then the argument is converted to a string first. % (prefix)r% (prefix) Return a formatted version of the argument. The first argument, format, is a format string. If the argument being formatted is a container type (list, tuple, dictionary or set), then the argument is converted to a string first. The second argument, var, is a variable that will be substituted in the formatted result. If substitution occurs for the first argument, then it must occur before the format is applied. If substitution occurs for the second argument, then it must occur after the format is applied. The parenthesis there are actually just for the documentation, just like the documentation for a function in Python is simply the signature. If you execute: >>> '%r' % (1,2) '%r' % (1,2) '1,2' >>> '%(1)r' % (1,2) '1,2' >>> '%r%r' % (1,2) '1,2' >>> '%
