We have $f(x) = -\log_a(x)$ where a is a positive integer. How do I prove this function is real-valued, monotonically decreasing function? A: By definition: $f(x) = -\log_a(x) = \log_a\left(\frac{1}{x}\right)$ Note that $\log_a(x)$ is a monotonic decreasing function because $\log_a(x) = \frac{\log_b(x)}{\log_a(b)}$ is a monotonically increasing function. Taking the inverse function, we know that $\log_a(x)$ is a logarithmic function. What makes a documentary filmmaker's film unique? I'll begin by confessing that I know next to nothing about the production of an independent film, so take this not as a formal definition or for criticism, but merely as my opinion. That said, I feel like there are certain "traits" in most independent films that make them unique. How would you define your film's "traits"? Let's begin by talking about the film's visual style. There is a tendency to confuse the "style" of a film with the "technique" of a film. There are many examples of films that have a stylistic "look
