As the amount of electronic devices and digital information processed in society increases, the demand for memory capacity and storage speed is becoming more urgent. One way to increase memory capacity of electronic devices is to increase memory density. However, as memory size is increased, the size of memory cells must be reduced, along with the physical space required to address and access the memory cells, such as the number of bits in a row address or column address or the number of pins needed. Conventional dynamic random access memories (DRAMs) include several DRAM cells each consisting of a single transistor and a storage capacitor for storing one bit of data. As the size of the capacitor is reduced to increase DRAM cell density, the capacitor must be highly reliable and have a large capacitance in order to hold a charge sufficient to be reliable and distinguishably charge from noise in an adjacent DRAM cell. In order to increase the capacitance, high dielectric constant materials can be used, resulting in a high- κ dielectric layer. Silicon nitride (SiN) having a dielectric constant of about 7 to about 9 is used to form the high- κ dielectric layer. Alternatively, a cell with a metal-insulator-metal (MIM) capacitor structure can be formed by etching openings through a dielectric layer, followed by a deposition of a capacitor electrode over the opening. A suitable dielectric layer is then formed over the capacitor electrode. However, the leakage current through the capacitor electrode is high, limiting its use in DRAM devices. To avoid this problem, the capacitor electrode is placed over a polysilicon plug and an additional dielectric layer is formed over the capacitor electrode. In this situation, the process is complicated and additional process steps are needed. Another conventional DRAM cell is a capacitor in a trench (CIT) DRAM. In CIT DRAM cells,

For almost a decade, there has been an increasing interest in the use of biological therapies for the treatment of chronic inflammatory and autoimmune diseases. These therapies are genetically engineered to selectively target and neutralize key molecules of the immune system. At present, numerous therapies are in clinical development, and the number will continue to grow. One of the major obstacles for the development of these therapies is the potential for immunogenicity and immune-mediated adverse events after systemic administration. Newer forms of administration, such as local delivery or passive immunization may be devoid of these problems. Moreover, biologics can cause unpredictable and sometimes severe, unanticipated adverse effects. Newer drugs are more complex than the first monoclonal antibody; thus, their development is more difficult than the first to understand and predict. This review discusses both pharmacokinetics and immunogenic properties of the newest biologic agents used in the treatment of inflammatory and autoimmune diseases. What is too much I'm not sure, too much almost always means no more for a while, I have a lot of time to play with, and I am looking for a good way to spend it. So far the most successful thing I've been doing is running and pretending it's 2.5 hours a day. I have quite a bit of intensive other things I can do to beat the time but unfortunately I can not make my wife happy by playing so I have to work out something else. I have no real idea about football so I'm very new to this game. However, I have time and I'm having a lot of fun, watching the FC Bayern match until late, I didn't go as far as who defeated who, because I don't know the rules but just watching and enjoying it. Thanks for reading. I know that is not so much but I'm not much of a talker and I'm most happiest when I'm working out. Good luck with everything. I hope you find a way to keep fit but if you do make sure you enjoy it. Q: Xcode 5 Bug: NSMutableArray
