After working on the county's controversial Purple Line expansion for years, Cross County will face a final decision soon — one that has torn its community apart. The transportation board will decide whether to grant a $159.8 million contract with a Minnesota-based company to build the last nine miles of the $1.7 billion project. Earlier this year, the Metro Council put the Purple Line expansion on the November ballot and voters easily approved it. Then-board member Regina White-Powers convinced county staff to work on the project through an amendment. That was seen as a gamble by many, but White-Powers said that's how she rolls. "I get a little wound up and feel a little passionate about public projects," said White-Powers, who worked for 20 years on transit projects in Washington, D.C., and Arlington, Va. "We always wait too long to do public projects." Metro planners, White-Powers and others point to recent work on 77a5ca646e
