A lot of people are excited and are ready to enjoy the offseason. But for the Los Angeles Dodgers not to enjoy it, it will be very difficult. They have a big offseason ahead of them. Even though they won the World Series, there are still a lot of things that they need to do to get their team back to the playoffs in 2019. One of the biggest issues the team is going to have to contend with is how the Dodger bullpen will look next year. After blowing a 7-0 lead in Game 7 of the World Series against the Houston Astros, bullpen issues became a big problem for the Los Angeles Dodgers. Now the team has to decide which players are going to be part of the bullpen next year. It's time for the Dodgers to make some tough decisions. The team can't afford to have a bullpen that doesn't give them the best chance to win games. The team has a lot of options in the offseason but the team will have to make the tough decisions. The best way to do that is to come up with a plan of action. It is time to start taking some of the very important decisions in this offseason. Dodger bullpen issues In the two series the Dodgers were playing in the World Series, they had seven people on their bullpen. However, one of the main problems they had was the bullpen had four different lefties who threw very different types of pitches. Clayton Kershaw had a very good fastball but a lot of problems with his slider and changeup. Walker Buehler and Ross Stripling were very good as well but couldn't get through the seventh or eighth inning. They had to go to Kenley Jansen, who is a very strong closer but his game might not be as strong if he isn't used to having a lead. On top
