free so long as payments were made on time, an amount owed by those who did not pay could in theory be compensated by a 10-percent annual rate of interest. But because interest is added to the principal balance, consumers might not be able to afford this loan. That is why, in the consumer context, the rate that governs changes in the principal balance is called "acceleration" interest. When the principal balance changes under an open-ended loan, the interest rate is pegged to the prime rate, an interest rate set by banks to reflect their credit risk. The New York legislature believes that a prime-rate interest rate is more likely to align with the consumer's needs because consumers will not be overwhelmed by the debt that is rolled over under the loan. The New York legislature is now doing what the Vermont legislature did with its add-on interest provision in Maynard. Compare Vt. Stat. Ann. tit. 9, § 2415(a), with N.Y. Gen. Con. Law § 3813(c) (West 2014) (referring to interest on defaulted loans). The legislature is transforming consumer loans from open-ended to closed-end loans, such that the interest rate is set to the prime rate, and borrowers are no longer entitled to free interest so long as the principal balance is paid on time. See id. § 3813(c). Although the New York legislature has revised the -8- language of its statutory framework in Maynard, our decision should not be read as holding that the consumer-finance interest provision allows for interest add-on, or as disapproving a public policy shift that is a common feature of consumer loans in the nonprofit housing context.
