the first auto project produced under a 2017 licensing agreement it struck with Myanmar's military rulers. That the army has agreed to license the car's production in return for a cut of the profits will only increase pressure for Suu Kyi to act. Buddhist-majority Myanmar's army has poured money into the country's economy, with state-run entities 1cb139a0ed
