Scan and Copy ManagerOne of the really interesting things about the Ebola crisis is the way in which the disease itself has changed over the past four months. What started out as an unimaginable horror quickly turned into a highly contagious disease that's treatable and curable, then quickly reverted to a horrifying deathly scourge in September. More people are dying from the disease, but the death rate has stabilized at 80 percent or so, so many people who were initially sickened are now getting well. That's been true even though there's a constant stream of new infections, and nobody really knows why. We do know that the pattern is changing, and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) just put out a report showing precisely what's going on. The earlier surges of Ebola came in July, August, and September, and now there's a new peak that's heading into October. That's somewhat expected, since people in the hot spots like Guinea and Liberia are now forced to stay put while the national response teams come in. The transition from a deadly outbreak to what the CDC calls "a community-transmitted epidemic" is a slow process, where people get sick and then run out of treatment in the early days. Over time, more and more people get sick until the disease begins to spread more widely and then it stabilizes. The changing pattern is pretty evident in the reported cases over the last month: The pattern is a bit interrupted by the latest spikes in Guinea, which have been getting a lot of attention
