Sitting like two old men, we listen to the dialogue... My husband and I have been married for nearly 17 years. (Good thing we didn't start having kids until we were adults). Despite the fact that we are both college graduates, he is a certified public accountant and I am an attorney, I still find that his way of thinking and mine are sometimes poles apart. I tend to let my feelings out more in our conversations than he does. He is more apt to keep his cool in a "we'll talk about it" kind of a situation, and is usually more satisfied with an end result. I'm the one who tends to be mad when something doesn't go the way I'd like it to. Perhaps because I was taught to never express emotion. Either it's one of those times or someone's not listening, or we aren't on the same page. I'm usually the first to fire off a sentence when I've been upset. He usually stays quiet (I'm pretty sure he doesn't like being the first to speak when he's mad), but even when he does, he has a tendency to shoot things from the hip and to assume that what he's thinking and how he feels is what everyone else thinks and feels. Not really. I know that. It's not that he hasn't got an opinion on things (or me) but I don't know that he puts much thought into it or listens to what I think before voicing his own.

He usually knows what's going to happen and he's usually right. So, when he and I sit and have a conversation and I feel that the way he's talking about something or the way he's responding to something I'm saying or the way he's letting me express my feelings isn't how I really feel, I just let my feelings fly. It's frustrating to say the least. We have a really cool relationship and if I had a dime for every time I've pulled my hair out because he's wrong and never sees my point of view, I'd be well-off.

Yet, when he and I were getting married, I was quite certain that we'd
