(KOIN) — The board of directors of Portland Public Schools will get a free pass on using surveillance equipment, even though its superintendent previously said they would not. After a board discussion, the board will send a message to the Superintendent Thomas Smith. The message says school board members cannot use the district's surveillance equipment and technology. Board member Ruth Suttles pushed back about board members being able to use surveillance equipment, saying it is not within the district's power. "We are not the technology company, we are the education company. We're not the government. We're not going to be the police," Suttles said. Related Content She said the board also needs to know who the intended audience for surveillance equipment is. The board will also urge Smith to look into purchasing a device to allow board members to review surveillance video and audio captured by cameras and recording devices. Board members think it would help with board-level security. Smith is meeting with the school board on Monday to discuss the need for surveillance devices.Andrea Lee Wright Andrea Lee Wright (born March 2, 1975) is an American journalist who is currently the associate editor of The Daily Beast.
