Q: Changing the order of operations with chained method calls Consider the following code (which fails because "Two" is not a number):
class Foo def bar(num) num.times.sum end end I could solve this by saving the class variable to a local variable that is only set inside of the function: class Foo def bar(num) @num = num num.times.sum end end But what if this was a part of a chain of method calls? foo.send(:bar, 3).send(:times, [1, 2, 3]) This is a contrived example. In reality, this code may be part of a large method that is passed a number of intermediate objects. My initial thought was to save the.send(:times) method as a local variable so that I can call it as a method inside the "bar" method. My question is: Is that a sensible solution? Is there a better solution? A: This is a contrived example. In reality, this code may be part of a large method that is passed a number of intermediate objects. It's contrived. This code should not be used in real life. My initial thought was to save the.send(:times) method as a local variable so that I can call it as a method inside the "bar"
