A web site is a location on the World Wide Web where content (e.g. text, images, video, audio, and other multimedia) is displayed for users.

The content is presented in a way that allows users to navigate through related content by following the links provided in the text. In the modern Internet context, a web server is a computer that runs software that delivers web pages to client computers across the Internet. The web server software usually runs on a computer called a web server. Typically, a web server hosts a small number of named web sites. Modern web servers are highly optimized for the task. Web site servers may run in a number of configurations, including: A single web server can host multiple sites. A web server can host multiple sites, each of which might be configured using one or more virtual hosts. Many web sites in a given organization can be served by a single web server. The software may be available for download from the web site, and several software packages are also available for free. A web site may also provide software for users to install locally. A web server can either work as a stand-alone server or be a part of a web hosting package. On the client side, the web browser uses a program called a web browser to access web pages and display them to the user. By contrast, the client software for web pages can be designed as a standalone application or be a part of a larger application. Modern web browsers are highly optimized for the task, with rendering and JavaScript engines typically being at least as fast as many standalone applications. Faster file transfer The use of the internet in other fields has allowed computers to share data and files and transfer data between them in a much faster and more convenient way, compared to file transfer between two computers. For example, smartphones allow users to transfer data much faster than through a wired connection using an ADSL, Fibre or Cable connection. A typical smartphone can transfer
