Longmont's Playground Contributes to City's Community Health Longmont's Town Center playground has been named one of the 100 most healthy parks in America. The assessment is part of the 2014 Healthy Parks, Healthy People: A Call to Action report from the Trust for Public Land. The nonprofit organization identified the parks most engaged with local communities and cited Longmont's Playground as one of the best. "We selected the parks that were most engaged with the community to see how they were prioritizing health," said John Wagner, the Trust for Public Land's senior vice president for advocacy. "The Town Center playground was one of the first community led and family oriented parks in the country." The report underscores the importance of well-maintained parks. "Our kids should be able to spend their free time playing, not sitting inside," Wagner said. "If we don't have parks, we have to find other ways to create play spaces." Longmont Parks and Recreation Director Mary Brannan has also made her stance on play clear. Brannan is all for creating more outdoor play environments, and she thinks town parks like Longmont's Playground are the way to go. "When we talk about creating spaces that are healthy, it's about bringing people together," Brannan said. "It's great that the Trust for Public Land is making this recommendation." A Day at the Park Longmont's Playground was created in 1975. It was part of the first major network of sidewalks that included the city's first parking meters. Brannan says the playground is a community space, and she wanted the people who originally installed the playground
