Collagenase in the induction of basement membrane degradation. The relation between the gelatinases and collagenase in the degradation of basement membrane was studied with mouse epidermis. The cultures were labeled with ^{14}C -proline and the release of radioactivity was determined as a measure of the level of degradation of the basement membrane collagen. It was demonstrated that the release of radioactivity occurred during a lag period after the start of the assay, the length of which depended on the concentration of the enzyme being assayed. This lag period was shorter with more concentrated enzyme preparations. When the collagenase was first added to the culture, it continued to degrade the matrix while no degradation occurred if the enzyme was added first to the collagen substrate. In addition, the inhibitor antibodies also inhibited the release of the matrix components when added first to the collagenase. A breakdown of the collagen components of the basement membrane was also observed microscopically at the cell-matrix interface with degradation occurring immediately beneath the cell that was deposited on the matrix. The participation of human papillomavirus-specific cytotoxic T lymphocytes in spontaneous regression of genital warts. Infection with certain types of human papillomavirus (HPV) is a necessary, but not sufficient, cause of cervical dysplasia, yet factors that regulate the clinical outcome of genital wart infection are unknown. The cytotoxicity of HPV-specific T lymphocytes may mediate clearance of HPV infection. To study the role of HPV-specific T cells in spontaneous regression of genital warts, peripheral blood was obtained from 11 patients with a single episode of genital wart disease. Patients were negative for HPV-specific antibodies and T cells on two occasions at least 1 month apart. HPV6/11-specific cytotoxic T cells were detected in four patients, all of whom were negative for HPV-specific IgG antibodies prior to wart clearance. HPV6/11-specific T cells could be induced in vitro in the presence of autologous whole wart cells from these four patients. In contrast, T cells specific for other types of HPV were not detected in these individuals. These data suggest that cytotoxic T lymphocytes specific for HPV are important for spontaneous clearance of genital wart infection. Wages were lower in 2013 than in the previous year and 2011 despite high rates of employment, according to Labour Ministry figures released today. Wages increased 8.6 percent in 2013, compared with 14.5 percent in 2012, and were at their highest level since the
