The present invention relates to a device for separating water from a gas stream. More particularly, the present invention relates to a liquid-liquid extraction column having a thin-film micro-channel array. Gas separation using liquid-liquid extraction is a well-known process for separating gaseous components from one another. Liquid-liquid extraction involves contacting an organic extractant with a gas stream and a separation column is used to separate the aqueous extract from the organic extract for subsequent evaporation. In conventional liquid-liquid extraction systems the choice of organic extractant and aqueous solvent depends, among other things, upon the relative volatility of the gas components and the desired separation of these components. Separations of gaseous components which involve carbon dioxide and hydrogen from air or steam are used in many industrial applications. Conventional liquid-liquid extraction columns are relatively expensive and require a great deal of space. U.S. Pat. No. 4,600,945 discloses an annular array of microchannels formed in a drum-shaped element. This arrangement suffers from the disadvantage that the same channels are used to perform both gas and liquid-liquid extraction operations. Accordingly, an object of the present invention is to provide an improved liquid-liquid extraction column. Another object of the present invention is to provide a liquid-liquid extraction column which requires less space than comparable prior art devices. A further object of the present invention is to provide a liquid-liquid extraction column which does not utilize the same channels for both gas and liquid-liquid extraction. A yet further object of the present invention is to provide a method for separating gas from liquid and thereby remove much of the water vapor present in a gas stream.

This week I am sharing the process of building a Lego Noah's Ark using some of my old Duplo bricks. I am a huge Lego fan and really enjoying building with these fun little blocks. I was excited to see that there is a Noah's Ark set available and wondered how I could make one of my own and use my Duplos instead. I was using 1.5 kilos of brick but didn't feel that was enough to make one of my own. My husband suggested that I look into some of the 1.5 kilo Noah's Ark sets for parts and I ended up building my own. I will share the process of building and decorating this Noah's Ark project in a separate post. There are a lot of great creative ways of decorating with the bricks. The entire project takes about four hours to build. You may want to start this project before you go to bed or do the build during a TV show. The kids will be sure to enjoy helping you. This is a great project for all ages. If you like using Legos or Duplos these are the perfect blocks for you to use. I would like to thank my husband for helping me build this fantastic project. We now have a wonderful Noah's Ark to enjoy and we are very thankful for the fun that we have had this week. If you are looking for a fun project to build with your kids this weekend, or just a great project to enjoy on your own, please check out Noah's Ark.

and other deep learning models. Transfer learning enables the use of models trained on a large data set with a large number of features to solve new tasks for which only a smaller data set is available. However, due to a lack of deep feature extraction techniques, most models trained with conventional transfer learning approaches suffer from a lack of diversity and a lack of depth when applied to new tasks.
