Q: Can I make Server 2008 R2 trust a UNC path for a user account? Here's the question: Say I'm logged into a server as a normal user. When I use Windows Explorer, I can see, access, and easily change the content of a mapped share from this server. If I look in the user config, I can see this share listed as a "trusted location". Now, I want to use this UNC path for some specific users. I don't want to do this every time they log into a Windows Explorer -- is there any way to tell the Windows Group Policy system to make this path a trusted location for some specific users? Is there some way to have System apply this policy to these users on an individual basis? A: Do not use Windows Explorer with mapped network drives. Use NET USE. Last summer, when widespread protests and large-scale riots broke out across Venezuela, the Maduro government took to social media to warn that it was a

Trojan Horse, and that it was being invaded by the CIA. It was far from the first time Maduro has claimed to be under attack by the Americans. The populist then-presidential candidate who swept to power in 2013, first making himself the country's "supreme commander," has used similar rhetoric for years as a way to inspire and rally his supporters. Now, with Maduro's current term for which he is constitutionally barred from seeking reelection coming to an end in January 2019, his allegation of a Washington-backed coup has fueled calls for early elections. The U.S. embassy in Caracas did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Wednesday. According to the Washington Post's account of events, there are several reasons why the policy might have worked. In a surprising revelation, President Nicolas Maduro accused the U.S. Embassy on Wednesday of funding and coordinating the opposition leader Juan Guaido's campaign for the planned early elections, and said that the U.S. was responsible for any violence that might break out during the events.
