Types of welding tools may be used in an industrial setting to join products together in various forms. When welding two different metals or dissimilar metals, the types of welding tools used may vary. However, when welding the two sides of a sheet metal product, one side may be flat while the other side has a contoured shape. Typical welding tools may include metal welding rods such as a welding rod which may be pushed into the sheet metal during the welding process. Such metal welding rods may have a flat pointed tip that may be pushed into the sheet metal and may be pulled out during the welding process. Such metal welding rods may be pulled out when the product is torn or cut apart because a pointed tip may facilitate holding and manipulating the metal welding rod as it is pulled out of the product. However, steel is generally heavy and may be difficult to manipulate. In addition, most steel welding rods may require relatively high currents in order to produce a satisfactory weld. Another common method of joining metal is by using a gas torch which may include a gas containing a heat transfer element such as but not limited to a wire. But, a conventional gas welding torch may not be adaptable for use with sheet metal. This may be due to the flatness of such sheets. Thus, in order to create a gas torch that may be able to properly weld sheet metal, the shape of the gas torch may need to be significantly altered. A gas torch for welding sheet metal may be described as being a hand operated gas torch that is equipped to apply welding power to sheets of metal. Conventional hand-held gas torches are known that include a tubular body that may be mounted on a carriage, which may in turn be fixed to or be capable of moving along a base. The carriage may be able to move along the base while heating and depositing gas into the tubular body that may be turned by hand to weld sheet metal. There are many gas torches that may be used for welding sheet metal. However, such torches may be used for welding sheet metal having a flat shape and may not be used for welding contoured sheet metal. Because of the difficulty of welding contoured sheet metal, there are many applications where conventional welding methods may be used. One application may be in the area of car body welding. A conventional method of joining two sides of a flat sheet of metal (i.e. the roof panel and the floor panel of a vehicle) may include a gas torch that is coupled to a metal welding rod that may be thrust into
