Results of our special "shark bite" training using a tremor-amplification device. Patients with severe stuttering are confronted with it as a negative experience, which directly affects psychosocial well-being. Current therapeutic approaches focus on altering the behavior itself, based on the "self-stabilization" theory. In order to change this behavior, we used a tremor-amplification device with a 1.2% hyperventilation and a 2% reduction of blood pressure. In a pilot study, we experienced that out of 25 patients, 3 patients could be handled successfully by using the device only. The focus of the current study was to investigate the efficiency of the device in those three patients in a second step. Following both the successful and the failed therapy, we were able to analyze the patients' tremor behavior. Tremor amplitude was reduced in all patients. All patients reported an amelioration of their speech. This led us to conclude that the tremor-amplification device is a helpful tool to suppress startle-related response in stuttering. Oral contraceptives and the risk of gastrointestinal cancers.

A: You need a license key for the software, but it's only for the registered Windows product you installed it on. You have the product key, you just need to enter it. $\sqrt{2+2\sqrt{2(1-\gamma/2)}}$
 $\left[(3+\sqrt{2})^{1/3} - (-3+\sqrt{2})^{1/3} \right]$ \. \$\$ This value is somewhat different from the value in [@kuss]). It is however in agreement with the values of the even moments f_a and f_c in [@kuss]. Note that this value is close to \$1.17\$, where the factorial divergence of the survival probability becomes very sharp.
