Known for her tough line against communism, she made the fight against the Soviet state a defining issue during her tenure. From the outset, she saw the conflict as a Cold War struggle which had implications for the wider world, and the UK and US remained locked in a continuous economic and military arms race. Conservative backbencher Enoch Powell predicted the creation of a 'United Ireland' if the British government did not intervene in the civil conflict. From 1983 to 1989, Mrs Thatcher fiercely resisted calls for a ceasefire and voiced fears that Irish Republican forces could use the referendum on Ireland's political future as an excuse to delay an end to hostilities. In June 1984 she claimed that the British government had 'no intention of relaxing its attitude to Northern Ireland', and a leaked cabinet memo showed that the Prime Minister's view of the situation had changed little since she took office 18 months earlier. No truce came, however, and the IRA exploded nearly 2,000 mortar bombs and gun attacks against the UK and its agents. In 1985, three IRA gunmen hijacked the ferry to Belfast and in July, the IRA executed three British soldiers at the Dubya Pub. The soldiers were killed because the Sinn Féin leadership wanted the IRA to seize British soldiers and facilities, and it demanded the release of three IRA hunger strikers in internment. In response, Mrs Thatcher ordered a resumption of internment and then invoked the state of d0c515b9f4
