I have just been asked to add a Magento store on this site and have been told to do it in cPanel. I am using a rehosted theme that comes with Magento (berghouse 2.0) and everything worked fine on the drupal side. But on the Magento side everything doesnt work. I have made an admin login and the default magento page displayed is the magento login page. I have no idea where to start looking, I have made sure I have all the correct files in the var/ folder (mainly skin,skin.admin,skin.front and static) I have just checked and the admin url and login page are in the admin/ directory. And the default magento page is in the root directory. I have a directory called/magento/skin with the skin.front, skin.admin and some additional files in it. Any idea what im doing wrong? A: It is almost certainly a problem of not having the correct rewrite url's in your.htaccess (and other rewrite related config, mod-rewrite.conf). Rewrite rules that should be in your.htaccess file for non-Magento-sites: RewriteCond %{REQUEST_FILENAME}!- e79caf774b

The following is a simple program to illustrate what I want. #include template void foo(typename T::type&){ std::cout a; } The point is to find out the underlying type of an instantiated template's type. Question : If I have a template class. How can I write a function which gets the type of the template parameter's type using the name of the template parameter A: A way to do that is by using typeid, typeid::name and the template keyword. template void foo(typename T::type&){ std::cout a; } The school, located on Liscomb Avenue, was completely sealed off, and French police were investigating the scene. According to the boys' account of events, it appears they were on their way to school on Friday morning when they encountered a woman on their way to class. Instead of just asking her to move out of the way as most students would, they decided to try their luck with a little improvised robbery. The boys apparently stormed into the woman's room, grabbed the nearest object — a guitar — and knocked it against the wall. The woman protested, saying that she was a musician and that she could play "Show Me the Way." But the boys weren't in the mood to hear her or anyone else play, and one of the boys pushed her in the head
