FIGURE 9-2 Here's a list of Photoshop's tools (and some areas to explore later in this chapter): * Photoshop is the name of the program. Its goal is to create raster images or manipulate and alter them with a paintbrush. The icons in the image window are explained in the next several sections of the chapter. * View is on the Tools/Window Menu and opens the image in your active view. For example, if you have a window open on the screen, you see the image from that window. If you have the Photo Bin open, you see the image from that image. * Design is on the Tools/Window Menu and opens the file with the active page in the document window. Photoshop is set up so that the active page is the working page. You create your graphic or photo by positioning your objects in the image window and then you use the Tools/Design command to design the page. You save it to your file. * Image is on the Tools/Window Menu. You can open an image in a new document window. * Layers are groups of objects in a Photoshop document. To make the image more complex, you create new layers that overlap and contain parts of an image. For more on layers, see Chapter 3. The Layers palette is on the right side of the Photoshop window. * Batch Process is on the Tools/Window Menu. Batch Processing is discussed in the next chapter. * Photomerge is on the Tools/Window Menu. This feature merges photos to create a panoramic image. This is a very time-consuming way to work. over twenty years. In terms of features, Photoshop is the most powerful alternative to traditional Photoshop, and many photographers have probably switched already. The present invention relates generally to a system and method for detecting the presence of fissures on a wall structure. More particularly, the present invention relates to a system and method for detecting the presence of fissures on a wall structure using digital image data. Over the last several years there has been a substantial increase in the number of building fires in the United States. Building fires are a significant problem because the structural damage can be extensive and, in many cases, the damage is not immediately obvious due to the fact that the building is not being occupied and the flames are not visible until they have reached a point where they can be seen by people working in the building. In many cases, individuals are unable to detect the presence of a fire until the fire has been visible for a sufficient amount of time for the fire to burn a hole in a wall. When this occurs, the fire has moved away from the wall and the damage is already extensive and significant. In addition to the fire damage, many of these fires involve partially smoked cigarettes, burning debris, or other flammable materials which are released into the environment during the fire. As a result of the damage caused by these fires, insurance premiums for many building owners have increased. In addition to increased insurance premiums, an increased number of building fires also results in a loss of time and money for those who are responsible for extinguishing the fires and repairing the damage that results from the fires. For example, when a building owner discovers the presence of a wall fire or a fire in a wall in a structure where the owner does not own property, the owner must remove the wall covering to locate the fire and then decide how to proceed. If the structure is a single-family home, the owner will often need to remove the drywall and wallboard in order to locate the fire. If it is a multi-family building, the owner may need to remove the ceiling tiles, the insulation, the electrical walls, the wallboard, and any other building materials to locate the fire. Once located, the fire must be extinguished, and the cost of repairing the damaged structure must be determined. If the wall is located in a single-family structure, the repair costs are often limited to the replacement of the wall covering, which is typically insignificant compared to the cost of the building. However, if the wall is located in a multi-family structure, the cost of repairing the wall can be significantly more than the cost of the wall itself. In view of the above, there is a
