The alkali-treatment of E. coli RNA in vitro leads to the excision of ribonucleoside monophosphates from the body of the molecule. This treatment removes a low molecular weight polyribonucleotide, not polyribonucleotides, from the solution. Ribonuclease activity is restored by the addition of fresh poly(A) to the alkali-treated sample. This ribonuclease is active in acid, neutral and basic media but is inactive in alkaline solutions. The low molecular weight polyribonucleotide and ribonuclease are separated by gel filtration into two fractions. The ribonuclease activity is associated with the low molecular weight polyribonucleotide. It is present in alkaline extracts of all the ribonucleases isolated by acid precipitation of ribonuclease-active alkali-treated extracts. Ribonuclease is also associated with RNA molecules that are isolated from organisms that contain a polyribonucleotide fraction resistant to alkali-treatment. Comparative tissue uptake of <sup>131</sup>I-MAG3 and <sup>123</sup>I-metaiodobenzylguanidine in normal and hypertrophic human hearts. MAG3 and metaiodobenzylguanidine (MIBG) are used for imaging of cardiac sympathetic innervation. They are different pharmacokinetically and the tissue distribution is not known. This study compares the cardiac uptake of [<sup>131</sup>I-MIBG] and [<sup>131</sup>I-MAG3] in hearts of patients with normal function to that of patients with high LV mass and in patients with heart transplants. The [<sup>123</sup>I-MIBG] specific activity was varied to keep the administered activity constant to further reduce differences in the extraction ratios (ERs) in the different groups. There were no significant differences in LV mass, ejection fraction or ERs for MAG3 or MIBG in the hearts of normal subjects. The ERs were similar for the right and left ventricular walls. The ERs for MAG3 were slightly but significantly lower for the myocardium than for the blood (P
