Using in situ hybridization and immunocytochemistry techniques, the presence of several hormone-sensitive genes including calcitonin, somatostatin, and thyroglobulin will be determined. The regulation of these genes will be determined by quantification of the transcripts using specific synthetic probes. The topographical analysis of the endocrine cells will be determined by in situ hybridization using the probes to determine the cellular and subcellular location of the mRNA. The anatomical patterns of the endocrine cells will be compared to the pattern of calcitonin secretion and the exocytosis of C-granules after the administration of secretagogues, including thyrotropin-releasing hormone. In addition, the presence of C-granules in a specific region of the thyroid will be studied using an antibody to C-granules. In the long term, this approach will be extended to include studies of the topographical arrangement of the endocrine cells as related to the pattern of NIS gene transcription.1.
