Making the transition from Photoshop to Photoshop Elements has been easier for some because of the similar names. By the way, Photoshop Elements was a step between Photoshop and Photoshop CS. If you're already using Photoshop, you might feel that Photoshop Elements is a big step backwards and you'd rather stay with Photoshop. This article will provide you with a complete list of all the things you can do in Photoshop Elements and several things you can't do. We'll provide an in-depth look at everything Photoshop Elements 9 and below has to offer. We'll also explore some of the newer features that most digital photographers and graphic designers are relying on.

Standard Features

You can use Photoshop Elements to edit photos, add effects, apply filters, crop, create new art, rotate, contrast, sharpen, paint, draw, paste, transform, and basically do anything you want with images. In addition, Photoshop Elements has a bunch of tools for creating and editing graphics including paths, paint, text, drawings, 3D objects, etc. Lightroom, an award-winning desktop photo-editing app, offers many of the same editing features as Photoshop Elements. Some of the other tools available for Lightroom are more specific, though.

Resolution and Scale

Photoshop Elements is a powerful image editor and you'll be able to adjust the resolution (i.e. pixel density) and scale the images to fit within the dimensions of a file, for example. There are a few ways to make images fit a specific number of pixels when you scale them down:

- A fixed px factor Largest Dimension Used Pixels A fixed px factor You can set Photoshop Elements to display the photos at a fixed number of pixels. The highest resolution photos (e.g. 4K, 12 MP) would have to be photographed at a small size in order to display properly at that pixel density. You would then have to expand (or shrink) the dimensions of the photo in order to adjust the size to a usable size.
- Largest Dimension You can choose to scale the image to fit the largest dimension. This would be the longest dimension of an image that isn't obscured by another aspect such as cutting off the bottom of an image or stretching the image to fit the screen. You can use this option to you have over me?' The defendant told the police that she told her husband not to kill him. She gave them the money which he had in his pocket. She was arrested. The supreme court held that the wife was sufficiently named in the indictment because the wife was the named principal in the charge of murder. She was in the actual perpetration of the homicide; she was the actual instrument doing the act with which the principal was charged. Here, the defendant was charged with robbing Stone with a deadly weapon. In this case, she was arrested. The evidence shows that when she was first arrested, she was wearing pants and a T-shirt. When she was examined by a doctor, he found blood on her body and under her clothes. The clothes she was wearing on the day of the arrest were not the same clothes she was wearing on the day of the robbery. The testimony of the police officer who saw the bloody clothes said they were taken from her at the police station in the presence of defendant's mother. The clothing matches the general description which was given by the victims and corroborates the testimony of the victims as to the description of defendant's clothing. There was testimony as to the clothing worn by the defendant on the day of the robbery. We hold, therefore, that the proof established beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was wearing the clothes described in the indictment and that she was the defendant that had robbed and assaulted Stone. We hold that the evidence was sufficient to uphold the verdict. The defendant first asserts that the court erred in permitting the state to impeach its own witness. The defendant then states that this error was compounded by the instruction given by the court to the jury. On cross-examination, the witness testified that he saw the police officers take a woman's clothes from her. The state then asked the witness to read part of the police report to impeach the credibility of the witness. The defendant objected on the grounds that the state was impeaching its own witness. In answer to this objection, the court said that the state is authorized to use the inconsistent statements of a witness in cross-examining him. After the witness denied making the statements that were contained in the report, the state asked the court to permit the witness to refresh his memory by reading the report. The court permitted the witness to read the report. The defendant then moved for a mistrial on the grounds that the state was impeaching its own witness. The court overruled the motion. The testimony of the witness was denied on the

Sydney, N.Y. -- A new study shows that advanced computer vision technology can help non-experts diagnose and classify car collisions for better road safety. The researchers, led by Shaoyi Cai, computer science professor in the University at Albany's College of Nanoscale and Nanoengineering, created a software program that automatically applies sophisticated computer vision techniques to photos of stopped vehicles in collision crashes, and analyzes those images. The software quickly classifies car crashes and injury severity. "A few hundred trained [computer vision] models can be used to provide assistance to accident-reconstruction experts, and to help non-experts recognize hazardous crash scenarios," said Cai, a member of the university's National Center for Computational Toxicology and the Albany Research Center for Network Science and Technology. Using an open-source computer vision software called TensorFlow, the researchers, who report on their findings in a paper titled "Automated Classification of Vehicle Collision Types and Severity," obtained vehicle identification data from police reports of over 500 vehicle collision crashes in 19 states. The authors also compared how their model performed with that of an automated model they developed using TensorFlow called Automated Traffic Collision Detector. The study used model-based methods -- ones that rely on a model's ability to make predictions rather than on how much it fits observed data -- because accident reconstruction experts' examination of crash damage and physical evidence to determine the cause of the crash often can lead to inconsistent data that leads to errors in computer vision algorithms that predict the type and severity of the crash. In one experiment, the model determined the type and severity of the crash 97.9 percent of the time, when the human-generated model could do so only 83.8 percent of the time. The research was funded by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency and the National Science Foundation. -- Shawn Owens can be reached at
