Continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) is the most effective treatment for obstructive sleep apnea/hypopnea syndrome (OSAH). However, despite the effectiveness of CPAP, patient compliance is suboptimal and identification of barriers to acceptance is required. This study investigates patient compliance in relation to hospital and physician and identifies the determinants of compliance. The objectives of this study were to determine the prevalence of compliance with CPAP, and to identify determinants of compliance. The study design was a descriptive, cross-sectional design in which patient compliance with CPAP was determined by a questionnaire, and factors determining compliance were determined by analysis of the data collected. Statistical analysis included multiple regression, logistic regression, linear regression and Student's t-test. A total of 110 patients on CPAP were enrolled into the study. Sixteen patients (14.5%) were compliant at night while 42.9% of the patients were compliant for at least 2 hours per night. Compliance was higher in the patients treated in a hospital with a special medical department devoted to sleep disorders (p plants which use natural gas as the fuel gas use so-called water/steam type boilers. This type of boiler is not only simple to operate but also reliable in that no trouble of a system valve can arise. However, in the case of a furnace of such a boiler which uses natural gas as the fuel gas and uses a reactor with the aid of steam, even if a system valve happens to malfunction, there is no leak of the gas because the steam, used as a pressure medium, is high in density. However, in the case of a conventional furnace wherein gas is fed into a furnace space by supplying such natural gas as to satisfy a desired pressure through a system gas feed line which has no means for gas pressure control but controls a gas feed rate per se, gas is normally supplied to a furnace in a proportional amount to the steam flowing out of a reactor, so that the gas will be fed into the furnace in excess when the steam is entirely or almost entirely shut off. In addition, in most cases the gas tends to assume a proportional amount to the steam flow rate. The excess gas which is fed into the furnace with the large flow rate is wasted as a gas burn in the furnace after combustion of the fuel in the furnace. This tendency is conspicuous, for example, at the start of the operation of the furnace.

Freshwater Jazz Festival The Freshwater Jazz Festival was a jazz festival held annually in the River Forest area of Chicago, Illinois from 2003 to 2009. The festival had been held at the Chicago Cultural Center from its inception until 2009, when it moved to the Chicago Cultural Center for a final time in 2012
