Q: Custom Field Validation for a Specific Form I am hoping to find a simple way to set field validation for a specific form. I have a form and its field name is firstName and age is secondName. I have not changed the validation rules in Salesforce. I am creating a custom controller where I add a few fields. When I have a record that has a first name that is more than 10 characters, I want the save button to validate the age field. I want the test to equal true if the input firstName is more than 10 characters. I am hoping that I can maybe just change a few validation rules and have that updated for my controller. Is that possible? Edit: I want to say that I am able to get it to work using a validation rule:

IF(!ISBLANK(firstName), false) AND(LEN(firstName) > 10) But

Q: What is a good agile practise to handle multiple versions of a story in one product backlog? We deliver multiple products with one product backlog for each product. We are now at the point where there are multiple versions of one story. Should I have different backlogs per version of the story or should we treat all versions of the story as one story? A: In most cases, one backlog contains all stories that will be implemented across all product releases, at least on the short-term horizon. However, it may be worthwhile to group all versions into one backlog when that is the case. This can serve as a sanity check: if you are doing multiple releases before a major release of the product, it is important that you have the different versions all set to release in the same time (or at least at close to the same time). On the other hand, it may be okay to split all stories if they are in the same state (i.e. the same user story). Splitting the stories would reduce the cost of development and testing. This is especially important if there are a lot of changes to the story. If your team is the sort that likes to work with swimlanes, I would definitely use one backlog for all stories. Hope this helps!
