What's new:

Without even being aware of it, I have created the comment for a dynamic view of the last 3 months and, as a side note, also for the next months. For the first time, somebody else (yours truly) is commenting data on someone's impressive site, the credibility of which I will recognize immediately afterwards. If you find any errors, please point them out. In case you wonder about the data.... well, that's mostly impossible now - at least for my reputation (as of now). So don't expect any response in case of an error. After all, that's simply not my everyday work. For the log, here they come: There are likewise other errors, but those two stand first in number - one I've spotted now, others are still mere guessing. Unless you knowingly lead to the position of „all hands“. Feel free to comment on the errors presented.

4. October and November This is my analytics page for my writing portfolio. Why? The following data was collected with the help of the Google Analytics.com There are also other websites with similar code on the net - that provide a similar function. All data is provided anonymized, so you can use it without asking permission. No need of a similar trading site - this is the best for this purpose. To exclude the Therollbank.net trade server during the collecting of data, use the site exclusion, you will find it on the google site. To be more precise: Select the „Land“ in the upper navigation bar, remove the name „Therollbank“. Click on the „Web Property“ of „Me: suan-kampa“. On the „Site properties“ there is a part where you set an exclusion. Note: You have to set a correct exclusion for links to Therollbank.net

5. Linux At the start of the month there was already server status on the order page, but the end of the month it was finally possible to trade (see below). You can therefore put it to the end. If you

Man Power Economics: Switching to renewables for jobs? Fascinating discussion I've just read on the Energy Charts, a must-read blog for green-minded people: In a land-owning society, it doesn't make sense to burn off land in order to build a power plant that will likely not generate electricity for many years. In a country with a rapidly growing population, such a strategy doesn't make sense. It's a beautiful state of affairs when electricity and other resources can be shared among all. Unfortunately, we are not there yet. It is not common for the land owner to share with a neighbor, or community, or city, or country, or continent... But, with the right motivation, the right planning, and the right resource handling, sharing electricity and other resources does seem to work. If we are to stop burning coal, natural gas, and oil, we need to "think differently". We need to employ these same resources to produce electricity and other energy-intensive products without a loss in quantity or quality. Any production method that can do this is by definition “more efficient” than current production methods. True, some methods take longer to perfect, but so does most innovation. We need to stop burning our energy resources. We need to replace the energy-intensive products we buy. We need to seek the production of energy-intensive products from energy that we don’t burn. How are we going to do this? Simple: We need to do what the Germans, and also the Chinese, have done. We need to get the governments to demand a switch to renewables for our energy production. Let’s talk about the Germans. The Germans have now demanded that the federal and state governments have a very specific plan, and that they specify that it includes a switch to renewable energy. That is, they want the governments to commit to a certain outcome. The Germans are in the middle of a planning process designed to create a sustainable world. They have a ten year planning process. At the end of that process, they have set a goal to be 50% renewable by the year 2050. They have also calculated how much energy Germany could produce by burning renewable energy instead of fossil fuels, as if they had not had the switch to renewable energy yet. That number is about 4 trillion Kwh of energy. That is an amazing quantity
