Allogeneic bone marrow transplantation is a treatment for high risk neoplasms and autoimmune diseases. A major complication of bone marrow transplantation is the development of graft-vs-host disease (GvHD), which occurs in 20 to 60% of recipients and often results in destruction of the gut-associated lymphoid tissues and subsequent graft failure. In the murine models of GvHD, blood platelets have been shown to play a major role in the production of clinical manifestations of this disease. Several investigators have shown that using a combined immunosuppressive regimen in allogeneic bone marrow transplantation can reduce the incidence of GvHD without compromising the graft-vs-leukemia effect. We have utilized a similar regimen in the treatment of a patient with systemic lupus erythematosus and multiple organ failure associated with aggressive and refractory thrombocytopenia. A rapid and safe recovery of hematopoiesis was achieved in this patient. In recent years, there has been a technology trend in a home gateway device in which a one-chip CPU (central processing unit) unit is integrated to form one unit. This technology is for taking advantage of a single-chip design and improving system reliability by integrating all necessary functions in one chip, in addition to improving production efficiency by integrating all necessary circuits in one chip. In order to allow the single-chip CPU unit to perform various functions, a large number of input/output (I/O) ports for exchanging data with an external circuit are required to be provided. Moreover, a large number of internal circuits have to be provided that perform various functions required in a single-chip CPU unit. Therefore, the one-chip CPU unit is required to have as many as the I/O ports and the internal circuits. In other words, the one-chip CPU unit requires many external leads extending there
