Once we enter the next dimension, a new technology or research on dimension will be added to the existing one. Players can train technologies, or make research in a dimension to the end to enhance the powers of the player. The story is about people that will live in the main universe. They are the players. Although we can use the technology to create a much bigger universe, but the speed of the universe will be much faster. So the universe will shorten and get closer to 0. The speed of the universe becomes faster, and the density of the universe becomes smaller. In this universe, players can make a universe of their own. Players can make their own universe to play with others, or they can make the universe for themselves to be alone. What's new:

* Shan Gui II is a lower quality of the traditional Chinese liquor Shan Gui (*⬜⬜) and is a fortification of both Shan Gui and red rice *(⬜⬜ (cooked red rice)). The former: a very bitter and cloying substance made by fermenting the dried buds of 'shan gui', a flowering plant. The latter: a wildly popular beverage in Fujian, originally flavored with the juice of something called 'osmanthus', sometimes mistook to be ' sweet osmanthus'. My thanks to ejba at the Message Board for alerting me to the existence of Shan Gui II and pointing me toward the Shan Gui article. And thanks to Mangguangyuan's excellent video guide, I know more now than I did before. That said, some cleverness is required to go past the pleasant masquerading as this fraudulent beverage. Zhen* Wang (⬜⬜) has done an excellent job. His explanation is as succinct as it is elegant. My thanks to him. In addition, the following information is extracted with his permission and from the book Persimmon Wine (⬜⬜⬜); emphasis in all places is Zhen* Wang's; quotations come from the book. Shan gui was first introduced to China in the reign of the Zhou dynasty (tenth century BC). It was flourishing all along the northwestern margin, and every one of its flourishing areas was called 'Shan gui'. In fact, the name 'Shan gui' came to mean the drink that flourished in all the 'Shan gui' regions. [Zhen* Wang uses this term to cover not only Yunnan but also Xinjiang, Gansu and Sichuan.] In the Tang period, before the consumption of the [Uighur alcohol] wine spiked, it was prepared using a wild rice plant, whose best known variety was ju chu ke, from the Ji Yue region which lies not far from the ancient territory of the mythical Shanyue. According to the Tang medical literature *(,the Zeng Zhong Dijing), the first Shan gui and ji chu ke tasted a close relation to each other. Both were made using the juice of ju ch
