9-on-9 tactical action RPG games have been increasing in number with time. However, most of them lack in depth of gameplay and dark atmosphere. This is the reason why we thought to develop a game where the players can enjoy a new and rich experience of tactical RPG games. As a result, with the development of the game, we made it possible for the players to make their own online adventure in the Lands Between. Your adventures in the world will be unique and different from others, and you will encounter endless challenges and threats during those adventures. Your player will become strong in strength by battling against others and making your way clear. What is most important is that, with the drama being created, your personal story will also be told. This is a storyline where the characters created by the player will make their way in the world of the Lands Between through their own actions. Therefore, a game where the players can freely build their own routes in a vast world with a variety of situations is being developed. What do you think about the game that is being developed? *The official website was updated on April 15, 2018. What's New • Tarnished Can you believe it!? Q: Bash: Automatically plot file directory for each run of script I'm calling a batch script from my bash script to clean up some files. But since the files are within multiple subdirectories, there is the risk I will overwrite something. My question is, how do I automatically show a list of directories the files are in? So that I can be sure to delete all directories before overwriting. I'm looking for something like the Windows CMD command dir /? that lists all directories. This is how the batch file looks like: @echo off for /f %%b in ('dir /b') do (
