Photoshop is a program used to manipulate digital images (photo, paint, illustration, video), on computer systems. It is used in graphic design, media, web design, photography, computer animation and many others. Photoshop features many editing functions such as making selections, adjusting color, increasing contrast, reducing saturation, creating and destroying objects and more. Photoshop was released on July 7, 1994, as the first version of the product in Adobe's Digital Imaging Suite. This suite has grown to four different applications for digital imaging, image editing and design including Adobe Photoshop, Adobe Illustrator, Adobe Fireworks and Adobe Media Encoder. Photoshop has long been known as one of the best graphics editors in the world. It's often regarded as the industry standard, because it's offered for a very affordable price, and it's used by an enormous number of creative professionals. If you know the basic computer skills required to use this software, you can enhance your images with dozens of editing effects and tools. If you have Photoshop, you can easily edit and enhance every digital image that you take, including RAW photos, which are stills from digital cameras and camcorders. To edit RAW images in Photoshop, you'll need to download the software. To help you use Photoshop efficiently, we created tips on how to use Photoshop. P.S: We've got more than 6,000 photos on our site and only a few are marked "download" UV-assisted biomass pretreatment and biocatalyst immobilization: A comparison of methods for efficient enzyme immobilization. Re-use of enzymes can lead to efficiency gains in industrial processes. Despite the re-use potential, use of an efficient and sustainable enzyme immobilization technology which holds the potential to achieve significant sustainability gains is rarely realized. Here, we report a comparison of the immobilization methods viz., adsorption, covalent attachment, entrapment and microencapsulation, for efficiency, sustainability and re-use of a significant biocatalyst. We employ crude cellulase (as a biocatalyst) from different sources which are pretreated and entrapped with or without a UV irradiation pretreatment. We investigated the immobilization process for biocatalyst retention, reusability and the efficiency and sustainability of this biocatalyst. The immobilized biocatalysts were tested for their activities on crystalline cellulose. We observed that the

Predictors of medication adherence among patients with cancer. Prospective and concurrent studies of patients with cancer have reported inconsistent results as to whether patient characteristics are associated with adherence to prescribed regimens. In addition, researchers have commonly defined adherence as self-reported use, which may be susceptible to recall bias and limited validity. To date, more objective assessments of medication adherence are necessary because of the implications for dose administration, appropriate clinical management, and health outcomes. This study examined self-reported, usual medication intake and a proxy for objective medication adherence, prescription refill measures, to determine the association between commonly reported patient characteristics and adherence. A cross-sectional, multicenter, prospective survey of patients from four cancer centers of the Midwestern United States was conducted. In-depth interviews with 20 patients with cancer were conducted for an additional perspective on patient adherence. Eighty-six percent of the 141 patients prescribed at least one prescription for a chemotherapy or radiation agent reported that they had taken all or almost all of their medications as prescribed. Logistic regression modeling showed that chemotherapy/radiation prescription was associated with adherence. In addition, patients who used multiple pharmacotherapies had a higher likelihood of adherence, and those who had an advanced stage of illness were less likely to adhere. Contrary to initial expectations, patients who were on hemodialysis were more likely to adhere to their medications than were other patients. A review of the literature showed that most studies had similar findings with respect to self-report and prescription refill measures of adherence. Specific medication regimens and side effects, but not patient characteristics, predicted medication adherence. Objective measures are needed to accurately assess the impact of patient characteristics on adherence. Because of the frequency of reported medication non-adherence and the implications for patient health outcomes, strategies to reduce non-adherence in patients with cancer are needed. 4.0.0 com.heibaiying.utilis
