Summary summary.Effect of exposure to cigarette smoke and mentholated cigarettes on electroretinogram responses in rats. To evaluate if exposure to cigarette smoke and mentholated cigarettes would affect electroretinogram (ERG) responses in rats. Adult male Wistar rats (n=16) were divided into: 1) control, sham-exposed group (n=8); 2) exposed to cigarette smoke, control group (n=8); 3) exposed to cigarette smoke and mentholated cigarette group (n=4). Cigarette smoke exposure was performed using a vaporizer (VEGA) and mentholated cigarettes were prepared using menthol (1g/cig), aluminum foil and 100ml of tap water. ERG responses were obtained before, 30 min after, and 24h after exposure to each condition, according to its respective groups. The ERG responses were evaluated using the average value of the readings at the dark- and light-adapted conditions of each animal. All ERG measures were compared between the control groups (groups 1&2) and after the treatments. Exposure to cigarette smoke produced no significant change on the responses recorded. However, exposure to cigarette smoke and mentholated cigarettes reduced the b-wave amplitude, specifically for the dim flashes. Exposure to mentholated cigarettes did not alter the retinal waves of ERG. These results show that exposure to cigarette smoke was insufficient to alter the retinal function. However, exposure to mentholated cigarettes decreased the retinal function, suggesting that menthol could be contributing to this effect.Neuromolecular
