The presence of toxic gasses in the air is both a nuisance and a health hazard. Currently, the only practical method for the removal of H.sub.2 S from gas streams is the use of chemical absorbents. A wide variety of such absorbents have been developed. However, they usually suffer from one or more limitations. For example, regenerable liquid absorbents are limited by the cost of regeneration, the amount of regenerant required, or the efficiency and ease with which the absorbent can be regenerated. Regenerable solids absorbents, such as activated carbon, suffer from the drawback that relatively large amounts of carbon are required. There have been recent developments in the field of regenerable solid absorbents, such as those described in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,863,554 and 5,078,879. However, although regeneration of such absorbents may be accomplished using either thermal or chemical regeneration techniques, typically the thermal regeneration technique requires a longer regeneration period and higher regeneration temperatures than is the case when the absorbent is regenerated using chemical treatment. Conventional chemical absorbents for the removal of acid gases from gaseous effluent streams are typically formulated with one or more amines, quaternary ammonium compounds, alkanolamines, alkali and alkaline earth metal oxides, alkali and alkaline earth metal hydroxides, or alkali and alkaline earth metal carbonates. After use, these chemical absorbents are generally regenerated by contacting

FxFactory is a free software for Windows and Macintosh. FxFactory Pro Crack Serial Number Mac/Win {Oct 12222}. The present invention relates generally to the detection of abnormal conditions in a product that requires multiple testing of multiple devices during processing. In the production of many devices, it is necessary to test the devices using various test procedures. Some products which are electronic in nature require testing at various stages during processing such as testing of a button while it is being printed, test printing before board assembly, test capabilities of an assemble board, and so forth. Other products need testing as they are being built. A number of test systems and procedures exist for testing various components of a product. Typically a test system includes a sensor to generate a signal that is used to test the component and an analyzer to determine if the component is functioning properly. It is imperative that each component, after completion of manufacturing, be correctly identified. These devices are generally required to be identified with a serial number which uniquely identifies the device. For example, if there are five identical printed circuits being manufactured, each circuit must be identified with a serial number that is assigned so that it will be unique. This serial number is used to correlate a specific printed circuit with a specific manufacturing step. Often a two-dimensional matrix of sensor and analyzer cells is utilized to simultaneously monitor a number of devices. It is often quite difficult to configure the sensors to detect the devices at the proper test points. Sometimes a sensor needs to be oriented properly at a specific orientation to distinguish two devices. Often in automatic test equipment, it is necessary to test devices that have been already in a package, inasmuch as, after manufacture, the devices are quite often prepared for testing in a predefined position so that automatic testing equipment need only focus on that specific package. It is known in the prior art to scan a character-type test pattern at the inputs of groups of sensing elements. In order to distinguish between two different test patterns it is necessary to compare the test patterns to determine which one is being sensed.
