bulb In logic and philosophy, a logic lightbulb denotes an illuminating argument against a belief or view held by one party, possibly to a detriment of other parties. It can be considered a logical fallacy if used inappropriately. One example is a disputed claim by an apologist about a prophetic writing. A less-than-ideal example is an often used argument by skeptics, which alleges that it is more logical to believe some religious writing to be completely accurate over others. Logic lightbulb reasons are used by apologists to explain the positive cases in which the Bible's claims were found to be true, and to explain arguments against that claim. While not all writings are the exact same "lightbulb" type argument, they all use the same basic form, and that form itself is divided into 10 basic types of reasons. The types of reasons include arguments from contra position, special pleading, common poor argumentation, just as many other forms. These forms of reasoning are usually discussed under a list of categories, called basic and logical fallacies, and catalogued from worst to better.

Logic lightbulb is an informal term (or analogy) from the British philosopher David Hume, which has been described as "the logical argument of the poor [sic] against the great." The logic lightbulb fallacy has been used by the Roman Catholic Church to further a "defender of the Faith" point of view, in regards to certain disputed issues, such as the teaching of the infallibility of the Catholic Church, or the theory that the Bible is inspired. Some other forms of logic lightbulb fallacies are:

Argument from contra position is one of the most criticized fallacies in logic and the bases of a logic lightbulb, because of its unbounded nature. This fallacy states that if we don't accept one claim, we must also dismiss all other claims of the same writer. This fallacy is also sometimes misleadingly called the argument from ignorance. A special pleading fallacy is a personal argument from an apologist's unique or specific difficulties (of him or his beliefs) to other beliefs or reasons regarding his issues. These excuses include such things as: "I don't know" "I've never thought about it" "I couldn't imagine such a thing" Common poor argumentation includes willful oversimplifications of concepts, deliberate mischaracterizations, fallacies of analogy, guilt by association, appeal to authority, and the cherry picking of support statistics or key words.
