Text size Atlanta is not the only city where Uber has faced a crackdown by city regulators. Other cities, including Boston, Honolulu, New York City, and San Francisco have also looked at Uber, because the company's surge-pricing business model has led to higher prices, sometimes doubling or tripling the fare from surge to surge. There was a time when it would be inconceivable for cities to move against a company that raised prices for consumers. But cities throughout the United States, including Honolulu and San Francisco, have gotten the message. On March 9, Honolulu published a new set of rules for its ride-hailing operators, which made many of the company's pricing and business decisions about liability and insurance illegal. The city also fined Uber $150,000 for failing to comply with its earlier regulations. The City Council also introduced legislation that would require Uber to meet minimum wage and other employment laws and reimburse drivers for the costs of obtaining special permits and insurance. Lyft faced a similar situation in San Francisco, where a city appeals court cleared the way for the San Francisco Municipal Transportation Agency to bring it under the law. Here are some things to know about the tough new laws in Atlanta. How is Uber surging fares? Uber surges its fares at times of higher demand to drive more users to the platform. Uber says it tries to reward the most heavily used drivers with a higher-than-usual fare. It's key that drivers understand that they're simply allowed to raise the price to make more money. "You're not mandated to pay surge," says David Kotz, a law professor at the University of Pennsylvania who studies transportation issues. "If you think about it, it's not like a waiter, where the waiter thinks he needs to raise the price to make more money." What happens when drivers unload their passengers at their destinations? Currently, Uber drivers receive no compensation from the company when they drop off riders at their destinations. But Uber is in the process of developing a so-called "co-sourcing" software system with the car-sharing service Lyft that will allow drivers to split the revenue they generate. How much of an impact are these rules going to have on the city? The Atlanta rules are expected to have a significant impact on Uber's business, especially as it moves toward the mass production of its self
