No signups. Facial disfigurement caused by a tick bite: association with previous tick bite. Blood transfusion reactions due to a tick bite are common. Serious consequences of a tick bite include local reactions around the bite site, erythema migrans and systemic reactions, including anaphylaxis. Local reactions occur, with or without prior history of ticks. We report a case of a 21-year-old man with facial disfigurement caused by a tick bite. The tick was a species of the genus Ixodes that was not identified. The patient had previous exposure to a tick as a child and had had an erythema migrans 3 years previously. No systemic reactions were present. The facial disfigurement persisted 8 weeks and no treatment was given, but the patient was well at the 4-month follow-up. Our case and the review of the literature suggest that facial disfigurement is a late complication, and it may be associated with previous history of tick exposure. We conclude that local and systemic complications of tick bites are rare, but probably underdiagnosed.

Ticks should be considered in the differential diagnosis of late complications after a tick bite. In recent times, much has been written about Dickerson and the Diamondbacks. He became the team's franchise leader in home runs. He became a household name in the community. He became a cult hero. At least from an outside perspective, Dickerson owned it. It became both his brand and his job. All of those things are true. But there is one element that has been largely overlooked. Dickerson was as much of a Diamondbacks cult hero as they come. What he did for his team served as a counterpoint to the utter disappointment of a season that ended with a Wild Card berth and a brutal playoff defeat by the Los Angeles Dodgers. He went from zero homers to 66. In 136 games. It is so easy to
