clinical outcomes for women with a prenatal diagnosis of intrauterine fetal death. The lack of a traditional fetal heart rate in the fetus following a diagnosis of intrauterine fetal death (IUFD) is a well-known phenomenon and limits fetal surveillance in the postanesthesia care unit. We hypothesized that simulation-based training in fetal cardiac monitoring would improve perioperative diagnostic accuracy and short-term clinical outcomes for patients with an IUFD.

Thirty-seven subjects were prospectively randomized to standard perioperative fetal surveillance with either 20 or 60 min of fetal scalp blood flow tracing. The simulated training group had a total of 25 min of training in fetal scalp blood flow tracing, as opposed to 20 min for the control group. The study also included a time-matched historical control group of patients who did not undergo simulation-based training. Tertiary care facility. Women with IUFD scheduled for birth. In the postanesthesia care unit, the simulated training group had a significantly better fetal heart rate tracing interpretation, measured as a higher incidence of uterine contractions and shorter fetal heart rate tracing duration. No significant differences were observed for maternal outcomes, such as time to postanesthesia care unit admission and the incidence of operative vaginal delivery or neonatal outcomes between the three study groups. Simulation-based training in fetal scalp blood flow tracing and interpretation was associated with improved perioperative care of women who have an IUFD.
