01BB24C364. . . A: Well, I have tried to reproduce your case and I have got the same error with the following command: `sudo LD_LIBRARY_PATH=/usr/local/lib./Dofus.exe` So if you try to run Dofus from your user account you will get the same message. Only if you run it using the root account (using sudo) it will work as expected. It's a bug in Dofus that it doesn't work with this path. For now there is no solution. If you have an older version you have to wait for Dofus to update. Otherwise you have to downgrade to an older version of Dofus. Please note that this issue is probably not the only problem with Dofus. Your opinion is welcome. Posted by cc on September 20th, 2012 — Over on the All you can Lift blog we got a lot of feedback and questions about the new Crossover program. There was a lot of confusion about the new program and how it could help you get in shape. This is what our senior developer, Jonathan Peiss, has to say: The main difference between the programs is that the Crossover program will only give you access to your fitness program at your location. If you have a link for example to a Gym Fitness or a Bootcamp, you can log in and see what they have to offer. If you have a unique URL, then you can only do that at your own location, so instead of logging in and buying the service, you just need to find out where your fitness program is and which of the interactive videos you can use. So instead of paying for Gym Fitness, Bootcamp or any other service, which doesn't have any advantages over the other, you'll be able to try it all out at home. You may see different prices on the other services, depending on your location, but once you login to your Crossover account you'll be able to see how much you get for free. In the future we'll probably have a video explaining everything in more detail. Over on the All you can Lift blog, we get a lot of questions and input on how we should improve the program. Of course your comments are welcome and we'd like
