One of the goals of computational physics and chemistry is to explain how the natural world produces macroscopic objects, such as rocks,...Hepatic pericytes in patients with cirrhosis: evidence of the hepatic origin of bone marrow mesenchymal stromal cells. Mesenchymal stromal cells (MSCs) are considered to be the endogenous counterpart of fibroblasts and present multipotentiality and regenerative capacity. Cirrhosis induces a different microenvironment in the liver and this may influence both the development and potential differentiation/transdifferentiation of local MSCs. However, the involvement of pericytes, which are regarded as an MSC reservoir in other tissues, remains uninvestigated. This study aimed to characterize human hepatic pericytes and determine their participation in cirrhosis. The human liver pericytes were isolated and characterized in vitro. Their differentiation capacity, expression of specific transcription factors, and their differentiation potential toward hepatic cells were also studied. Finally, in-depth expression of the genes involved in MSC multipotentiality, including Oct4, Sox2, Nanog, and Klf4, was examined. Hepatic pericytes showed similar morphology and surface marker expression to those described for other MSCs. These cells also expressed proteins specific to MSCs, including CD73, CD90, CD105, and Vimentin. Gene expression analysis confirmed their MSC-like phenotype. In vitro differentiation experiments showed that human hepatic pericytes exhibit multipotentiality toward hepatic cells. Finally, when compared with hepatic stellate cells, hepatic pericytes showed a more restricted pattern of gene expression. Our results indicate that human hepatic pericytes show specific phenotypic and morphological characteristics, thereby providing support for their potential differentiation capacity toward hepatic cells. Hepatic pericytes might play a role in liver regeneration and could therefore be considered a reservoir of these cells in the setting of liver injuries.Wednesday, April 10, 2015 Obama: The FBI Is Going to Get to the Bottom of the Breaches, and We're Going to Take Out the Ent
