This invention relates to processes for the production of a coppery silver-colored material that can be used as a decorative pigment and more particularly as a decorative pigment for chromatographic media. Some chromatographic media include a coating or other layer which is dyed with a pigment to provide a color to the medium. Since the media are often used in reaction or separation columns, it is important for the pigment to be stable and resistant to physical and chemical changes in the environment of the column. The pigment used for such applications should have a number of properties, including being physically and chemically stable, and non-toxic. Depending on the nature of the medium being used, it may be necessary for the pigment to be soluble in a variety of organic solvents, and/or capable of being chemically bonded to the coating applied to the chromatographic media. In addition to being stable and non-toxic, the pigment should also have the ability to properly match the original coloration of the medium and possess the proper degree of brilliance for the intended use. It is known to use ceramics and metals as chromatographic media, and to apply a thin coating to the outer surface of the ceramic media to impart color. However, as stated above, the pigment materials used on the media must be non-toxic, stable, and possess brilliance. In addition, the pigment materials must be stable to solvents used in the coating process, and hence be usable in many types of coating processes. Inorganic pigments of various shades of red, blue, and green are available, but there are no available inorganic pigments that provide a chrome-yellow appearance of particularly high brilliance. It has also been proposed to use polymethacrylate polymer, particularly methacrylic acid alkyl esters, as a coating for chromatographic media. The methacrylic acid alkyl ester polymer coatings are cured or cross-linked by means of known free radical initiators such as organic

Parts 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 | Part 6 My Top 5 Retro TV Game Collection

Parts Okay to start this post I'm going to have to preface everything with the simple statement of there is a difference between what I am and what I will. I'm an avid Nintendo fan, a gamer, a collector, and I will be unashamed to admit that. But there's a difference between what I want in a television set, and what is objectively good and a worthy purchase for myself, and what is good for collectors, and what is worthwhile. I come from a family that has a lot of built in stuff (and a long long heritage in the hobby), but I'm going to use myself as my frame of reference. So with that said, let's talk about a game collection. A collection of games is certainly something you should have, and if you have it in the home it is a wonderful compliment to your entertainment values, and to be honest something that you want in your own living space. I have a wide variety of video games in the house, Wii, X-Box, PS3, Nintendo, I own many for several different genres and in different systems. I say all that because we as people collect many different things - action figures, books, books we've seen, anything, collectibles, stamps, coins, and video games. Do I collect video games as a human being, "no not really," but I certainly do collect video games. There are many reasons that a person may build a collection of games for a variety of tastes, or you may choose to build a collection as a show of life's fondest memories - or to prove a point when your home gets destroyed by a tornado in the southwest. But how do I have a collection of video games within myself as a human being? Well first off, I have them outside my consciousness. I built a collection as a child, I collected for the sake of having fun, I built a collection as a young adult. But that's not how I grew my collection to its current size as an adult. I look for things that are important to me - Nintendo sure has a lot of head and shoulders above the competition. I will not buy a game unless I really really like it. Even now if I feel like I like a game, I don't buy the game. I

"We have a society that has lost the capacity to create. We are incapable of imagining anything that we haven't actually been told to believe in, and the artistic tradition of the Middle Ages which gave us some of the greatest works of western literature has been lost. Historically, the Middle Ages were a tremendous influence on western culture. They may also have been the only art form that was truly created by the people, for the people. We now mostly feel a sense of loss rather than excitement or aspiration, especially when it comes to creativity. As such, it has been a personal mission for Nino and I to make a game that explores the incredible creative spirit of the Middle Ages, and that we hope is a reminder to the world to begin a new era of creativity. " "The year is 1191. A full-scale invasion has been launched against the British shores, with thousands of Viking warriors preparing to raid and pillage the region. Over the course of a 24-hour cycle, the player must rebuild their village from scratch - or even move on before the enemy arrives. In Going Medieval, you have the chance to play as one of a handful of influential leaders from the Middle Ages, each bringing their own unique personality and way of life to build the British Isles into a thriving kingdom." About This Game: "Going Medieval is an exploration based, sandbox strategy game that centers around the creation of British society in the early Middle Ages. It is a tale of the seceding of the Saxon and Germanic tribes from the remains of the Roman Empire, the establishment of a number of new kingdoms, the populating of the land and the building of industry. It is also a story about the birth of modern Britain, and it is the first game in the series to be built from the ground up in Unreal Engine 4." "Going Medieval is a sandbox, real-time strategy game that allows you to play as one of a handful of influential leaders from the Middle Ages, as well as a creative writer and an artist. Using your influence over hundreds of individual characters, you must influence the growing British society of the early Middle Ages. Learn the skill sets of each, and meet their needs. Build a magnificent castle and use your power to build a world-renowned kingdom. As you play, you will forge friendships and alliances, experience the thrill of conquest and face the threat of banditry and rebellion. You will make decisions as you raise the Kingdom from its infancy. Will you live a life
