The term has been used since at least the late 1980s, in a variety of situations where data should be able to be passed between a number of different computers or computer systems, allowing them to communicate with one another. For example, during the late 1980s, engineers at the University of California at Santa Barbara used map-reduce for analyzing the Web, and map-reduce has since been used for conducting scientific research in areas such as social computing, bioinformatics, and high-energy physics. A data structure such as a hash table, or a tree, may be combined with a map network to create a linked map, which is then typically augmented with additional functions such as shortest paths, maximum-flow techniques, approximate string matching, for solving problems in distributed computing. These alternative applications of map-reduce are known as map-reduce programming. Addition of a map network to a hashtable also increases its lookup performance; this is because the network can be used to find a data element quickly, since the data element can be found more quickly by examining adjacent nodes on the map network. This is in contrast to using the hashtable for a lookup, which typically has to traverse the entire list of entries to find the desired object. Map-reduce is especially beneficial when used in distributed computations, such as those implemented in cloud-computing environments. Map-reduce provides an abstraction that enables multiple machines to be accessed as a single single machine. By combining distributed computing and map-reduce, the machines can be connected in the same network, but appear to the machines as if they were all running on one machine. The map phase in map-reduce is said to be performed in parallel, since it can be distributed among a number of machines. The reduce phase applies a function to each element, which is typically an aggregation function such as a sum or a maximum. The reduce phase is typically implemented as a single machine. Because map-reduce can work on a large number of machines, data can be analyzed in parallel, which may
