What's new in Panzer Corps 2:

The Isle of Jura () is a disputed island in the south-west of the Lough Neagh in Northern Ireland. The island is known for being a stop-over for migratory birds. At the last census in Northern Ireland, the island had a population of 6 people, and is part of the Mourne and Tretowie civil parish of County Down. Despite the small population, tourism is very popular. It has a 24/7 helpline. Name The traditional name of the island is Jura (Jur or Iurt). The island's coat of arms contains a white star on black with three semi-circles around the circumference. These three semi-circles are to distinguish it from the slightly smaller Isle of Rathlin. The star on black was chosen to represent the bell of Louis Pasteur's door frame. Places on the island Jura is approximately one mile long and one mile at its widest. There are three large rock pools which some people go fishing from. Average foot passengers on the island per day are approximately 1,500. The island sees approximately 3000 migrants per year, but sees no more than 500 land migrants. There is one pub on Jura. It can be reached by taking a walk between the two inlets known as Mouth inlet and Pipers Cove. This one pub and fast food camp store is owned by a Donald McDonald, who also happens to be the owner of McDonalds near Portaferry. When the island is approached, there is an NO TRESPASSING notice, and an islander will stop and say whether or not it's owned. A passport is not required to visit, although the island is owned by the state. There are three Churches on the island, Jura Church, Orangewood Baptist Church and Jura United Methodist Church. History The island has seen human activity since the last ice age. There were four hut caves on the island in 1712. In 1986 it was called the most visited hutsite in Europe and North America, but has now shrunk to only one. There is also a one mile walkway that takes part of it. The walkway has seen severe drop-offs in parts. As part of the walkway, there is a small forest of trees on the south-east side. Both of these forest trees have been brought there in the last 20 years. Huts have also recently been built on the island,
