All patients, who suffered from a pyogenic abscess of the liver between the years 1981-1986, were operated at our hospital. As a result a total of 58 operations were performed. 45 patients died during or shortly after the operation. In most cases there were associated lung or other abscesses. Death occurred with a frequency of 41.6% for patients with pulmonary, 36.8% for patients with multiple abscesses, 22.2% with septicemia. The lethality for patients with pancreatic abscess was 28.9%. Our data confirm the high lethality of liver abscesses, which is even higher than that of septicemia. This is due to the fact that most of our patients did not receive adequate antibiotic treatment and/or were not operated in a timely manner. Furthermore, a significantly higher incidence of pancreatic abscesses was found in our patients than in the literature.Injury-induced astrocyte and microglia activation in the anterior cingulate cortex and the hippocampal CA1 area: a combined multimodal study of immune- and GAP-43 mRNA expression. A major hallmark of aseptic inflammation is the characteristic reorganization of the microglia and the expression of growth-associated protein-43 (GAP-43), a protein crucially involved in neuronal growth and regeneration. These changes are supposed to reflect the activation state of glial cells, but their appearance has to our knowledge not been shown in serial sections together with the expression of GAP-43 mRNA, an essential messenger for growth and regeneration. So far, activation of microglia has been shown to occur in the nuclei of type I astrocytes and GAP-43 has been shown to be
