Bitcoin ended the year as the leading digital currency, despite earlier price volatility and lost market capitalization. Despite significant challenges, Bitcoin has been far from a tech bubble. If anything, it has had a broader adoption and impact than even its supporters hoped for. For one, Facebook has added crypto wallet support, Google and Apple are planning to release cryptocurrency wallets, and hardware wallets like Ledger and Trezor are being sold by Best Buy. Perhaps the most underrated success stories in 2017 were the lightning networks, and of course, the emergence of DAOs. As for the first, the lightning network is still in its infancy. A BIP describes a proposed protocol for a layer-two payment channel network, but the Lightning Network Development Group still has an ongoing quest to create a working implementation of the protocol. The Lightning Network Development Group is funded by the Lightning Torch, which is a fundraiser for projects implementing Bitcoin lightning. The network, pioneered by the conceptual work of blockchain developers Joseph Poon and Thaddeus Dryja, would allow users to create a trustless payment channel to each other, rather than routing the transactions through a chain of counter-parties. Unlike with Bitcoin, where every single transaction is individually validated and signed by every node on the network, the Lightning Network is designed to allow users to create channels, often referred to as lightning nodes, through which users can interact with one another for exchange of digital assets without having to validate every single transaction themselves. What does the lightning network have to do with blockchain? For one, it's self-described as a "layer-of any deal with Japan. "Actually, the public mood is not favourable at all, especially the will of the people in Hong Kong," he said. "These two things are completely separate." In an interview in January, Mr Chan told Reuters the trade dialogue with Japan was at an "advanced stage" and he hoped an agreement would be reached soon, putting an end to months of stony-faced negotiations between the two countries. "Hong Kong is the gateway to China," Mr Chan said then. "It's a strategic interest and a historical interest for us to maintain that. If the trade doors close to Hong Kong, that's very unfortunate." There are concerns that if many of the Chinese goods that enter Hong Kong annually are being shipped through Japan and then to China, it will prompt Beijing to look at more permanent means to cut off the mainland from Hong Kong. Mr Chan, who steps down as financial secretary in April, said: "No decision has been made at this moment." The rout in Tokyo's Nikkei shares has triggered a sharp sell-off in Hong Kong shares but asset-rich city-state fund manager Michael Shiu said there was no evidence of any major sell-off in mainland China. "I wouldn't be surprised at all if they start borrowing more, they have huge liquidity so I wouldn't be surprised if they do that. I think they are actually buying rather than selling," he said. Read more Trump warns China 'totally destroyed' U.S. trade deficit with China The collapse in Tokyo was fuelled by the "technical" weakness of the currency, which has weighed on Japanese stocks and property prices, he said, and it was not surprising that the benchmark Nikkei 225 index fell more than 3.7 per cent on Tuesday morning after closing down more than 4.8 per cent on Monday. Mr Shiu said the risk of a Hong Kong sell-off was low because the event was being driven by local investors who have been selling for the past two years, particularly because of fears of tighter regulation on mainland foreign investments. "What I can't imagine is an event [sending the market] down by 30 per cent. The drop over the next 12 months is likely to be between 15 and 25 per cent. I think we will see continued strength in the bank
