Privacy. 29, 1975, and are held together with rubber bands (or other suitable means) to provide a seal against leaking between the various building panels and the plastic liner. Such arrangements are simple and require only a reasonable degree of maintenance by the user. However, such known arrangements do not provide a continuous, durable bond between the individual panels. Other known arrangements include a series of rigid, generally U-shaped strips of material having one leg inserted in a slot formed in each panel. The free ends of the legs are bonded together at a butt-joint. Such known arrangements provide the advantage of providing a continuous bond between the adjacent panels. However, such arrangements, especially those having weak-builtlegs, tend to work loose or pull away from one another, thereby degrading the bond between the panels.Although the indigenous people were forced to leave in the late 18th century, the Kukma were never defeated.
